

It's the Right Time to Offer a Deposit-Based Liquidity Solution

Here's why:

1 Americans have a need for short-term funds

About one-third of consumers reported needing emergency funds at least once a year

About 26 percent of those were high-income consumers (with incomes over $100,000)

2 Americans want to get short-term funds from their financial institutions

People who use expensive alternatives prefer their financial institutions

Eight out of 10 current payday loan borrowers would rather obtain short-term funds at their financial institution

Bank account holders want short-term funds from their financial institution

Eighty-six percent of survey respondents needing at least annual access to short-term funds said they would be somewhat or very likely to use their financial institution instead of an alternate source

3 Account holders would change financial institutions to access short-term funds

84% of those with at least an annual need for short-term funds would either move their banking relationship or open an account at a competing financial institution that offered a short-term lending solution

4 Regulatory agencies and consumer advocates are supportive

In 2020, federal agencies and consumer advocate groups paved the way by publishing their support of financial institutions offering small-dollar lending alternatives

5 Financial institutions benefit by offering a deposit-based liquidity program

Improve customer experience

Reduce reliance on overdraft services

Retain account holders

Add non-interest income

Account holders are already overburdened by debt, stress and anxiety. They want an ally. This is an opportunity for financial institutions to fill a valuable need easily and affordably.
